Scalpel to Gavel: Exploring the Modern State of Health Law

Health law is among the fastest changing areas of law in our nation today. With the enactment of the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act, health law and the state of the country’s health care system are regular fixtures of headline news. And, as the Affordable Care Act rolls out, attorneys and physicians are on the front lines interpreting and implementing the new law’s provisions. The University of Toledo Law Review Symposium will explore the intersection of law and medicine and recent developments in health law. Four panels will discuss important areas of health law that are quickly shaping the modern legal landscape: (1) the quality and delivery of health care services, including the influence of provider liability on the administration of health care; (2) public health and various approaches being used to address the overall health of the nation; (3) the ethical considerations that accompany clinical decision making and treatment decisions; and (4) the problem of fraud within the health care industry and the work being done to combat it. Presenters’ scholarly contributions will appear in Volume 46, Issue 3 of The University of Toledo Law Review. Members of both the legal and medical communities are invited to attend.
